After Data Breach, E-Bay Encourages Users to Change Password

California-based eBay first urged its 145 million users to change their passwords three weeks ago - after determining that hackers had accessed a database containing customers' passwords and other personal information, including names, email addresses, physical addresses, phone numbers and dates of birth.

The breach occurred in late February or early March, eBay said.

The online marketplace said "extensive tests on its networks" had turned up no evidence of unauthorized activity stemming from the breach. It also said the cyberattack posed no threat to customers' financial data - including credit-card numbers - because that information is stored separately in encrypted formats.

PayPal, eBay's money-transfer service, reportedly wasn't compromised.

"However," the company said in a news release, "changing passwords is a best practice and will help enhance security for eBay users."

AmEx Credit Card Breach, How to Protect Yourself

In what's becoming an unfortunate ritual for U.S. consumers, news of another data breach, this time at American Express, is prompting calls for cardholders to protect themselves.

American Express announced that it was notifying 58,522 California residents that data including customers' names and account numbers may have been breached. More than 18,000 more California residents, the notice said, may have had other information breached, but not their names.

According to the notice, the company was informed by law enforcement that several large files containing the personal information was posted online by apparent members of an anonymous website.

Vice president at Equifax encouraged cardholders to check their recent transactions, place fraud alerts on their accounts and check their credit reports.

It's unclear when the data was breached, but AmEx first discovered it back on March 25, according to the company.
